It is our mission to teach the Holocaust because … “Education is the key to ending anti-Semitism.”

By Claudia Sachs

When I first heard about the murder of 11 Jews at the Tree of Life Synagogue in Pittsburgh, I was outraged, but not surprised. Part of me wanted to believe that events like these were exclusive to Pittsburgh. Here in Richmond, we have a Jewish community that seems safe and welcoming.

But more recently, my Synagogue has hired a full-time security guard, and I fear for my life during worship. As a high school sophomore in Richmond, my body has never physically been shot with a bullet, but my heart has been wounded by the anti-Semitic behavior of my peers.

A few months ago, I was conversing with a boy in Spanish class, and he jokingly stated, “Take a shower.” I said “Why, do I smell?” He chuckled, “No Claudia, I meant the showers of the Holocaust.”

I was furious, but these comments are all-too common. Students have asked if I have a “Jew nose” and “Jew smarts.” These kids are not malicious; they are ignorant. And in Richmond, their ignorance could stem into violence.

How can Richmond stop these “jokes” before they go too far? The answer is self-motivated education. People of all faiths should educate themselves about Judaism, visit Synagogue services, and learn about the inaccuracy of Jewish stereotypes.

Community members must abolish anti-Semitism through peer education and classroom engagement. At lunch tables and in the classroom, children, teens, and adults must form one bulletproof safety shield against hatred.

After the events in Pittsburgh and the neo-Nazi march in Charlottesville last year, we know the plague of anti-Semitism is slowly circulating around Richmond.

A mirror attack to Pittsburgh could be right around the corner if people remain ignorant.

Education may be the only thing left that can save us all.
