MAKING THE CASE

Instead of:

“We’re working to dismantle systemic barriers in our organization.”

Consider:

“We noticed that members from our Atlanta office weren’t advancing at the same rate as those in headquarters. By examining our promotion process, we discovered that informal networking played a bigger role than we realized. We’ve since implemented more transparent advancement criteria, and we’re already seeing more diverse talent moving up.”

MAKING THE CASE

Instead of:

“Our organization has significant disparities we need to address.”

Consider:

“We all want a workplace where the best ideas rise to the top, where advancement is based on contribution, and where different perspectives strengthen our work. We’ve identified some gaps between that aspiration and our current reality that we’re working to close.”

CREATING A MESSAGE

For Executive Leadership

Focus on strategic advantage, risk management, and long-term organizational health. Connect workplace fairness efforts to talent development, innovation, and market relevance.

For Middle Management

Emphasize practical tools and approaches that help them lead diverse teams effectively. Focus on creating psychological safety, resolving conflicts productively, and leveraging different perspectives for better outcomes.

For Individual Contributors

Address concerns about fairness directly. Be transparent about how decisions are made and how opportunities are distributed. Create multiple channels for input and feedback.
